Q: Streamline calculation of best fit regression line in R I'm trying to find the best-fit regression line between two sets of data, but the output from my code seems to be a bit off (see the bottom of the page). I found a nice example here: I'm trying to recreate the example but I'm confused as to why I'm getting a negative slope. Below is what I'm getting: > qq1 qq2 qq library(MASS) > qq position altitude date Vx Vy 1 -79 2.7 2004-03-21 2.72 -1.33 2 79 1.7 2004-02-03 1.70 -0.99 3 0 4.0 2004-04-01 4.00 0.00 1) dlm2

The effect of glucocorticoids on the de novo pyrimidine synthesis was studied in the rat and rabbit hepatocytes in primary culture. We found that in spite of a significant increase in pyrimidine biosynthesis activity, no changes in the content of pyrimidine nucleotides was observed. From our results, we may conclude that, as in the Ehrlich ascites tumor cells and cultured mouse L929 cells, the inhibitory effect of glucocorticoids on the content of pyrimidine nucleotides in the rat and rabbit hepatocytes is not due to a decrease in de novo biosynthesis.Q: Why should one avoid using a static initialization block? Why should I not use static initialization blocks in C# and what are the alternative solutions to achieve similar behaviour? A: Because it opens a large security hole. A: It's the way to access static variables without knowing their class name. A: I think static variables are sometimes a PITA, because if you aren't very careful and don't initialize them in the right order, they can cause a huge mess when loading your assembly. I have one static variable per class that loads a certain default configuration depending on what environment it is loaded from, and you can't really guarantee that it will be properly initialized before reading the variable. If you initialize them at the beginning of the app_start section of your web.config, then you can guarantee they're initialized before they are read. Nixon as Trump – we are in big trouble
