"This was the biggest story in the history of our country," Trump told supporters in Florida during a campaign event, referencing Comey's revelation that the FBI has been investigating newly discovered emails. "It's obstruction of justice. It's a felony." The remarks appeared to be an attempt to drive a wedge between the Democratic presidential nominee and key FBI officials. Comey, a former Justice Department official, is a longtime friend of President Obama who is widely regarded as a Bush-era holdover. And the FBI probe of Clinton's handling of classified information began more than a year before the election. In his letter, Comey wrote: "[W]e cannot find clear evidence that Secretary Clinton or her colleagues intended to violate laws governing the handling of classified information." Meanwhile, the New York FBI office is still examining the original Clinton email case, according to The New York Times, and Comey, a former federal prosecutor, has been calling it a "matter" rather than an investigation. Trump also took a shot at the public's perception of Comey, suggesting that the FBI director's politically charged "hey you'll never
