Q: TDD - Process Out Test Data Before Write I am trying to write a test in my build process. We are using rspec. Here is some pseudocode to explain what I am looking for: def test_with_response_header(auth_code, access_token, secure_resource_url, uac_url) method = AccessToken.new(auth_code) method.validate_hash(access_token) secure_url = SecureResourceUtils.gen_secure_url(secure_resource_url) secure_url = SecureResourceUtils.gen_secure_url(secure_resource_url, nil) response = secure_url.get(accept: 'application/vnd.openbanks.v1+json') assert response.header['Content-Type'].include?('application/vnd.openbanks.v1+json') assert response.header['OpenBanks-App-Id'].blank? method.process_response(response) assert response.header['Content-Type'] assert response.header['OpenBanks-App-Id'] assert response.header['OpenBanks-App-Token'] end The method I am testing calls a method on another class (much further down the code call path) that performs a database query and saves some data to the database. After the database call, the method calls process_response, but this is not possible to test inside of this method. How can I ensure that these database queries are run when the method is called? If I create a test database, that test database needs to be cleared out before a test case runs. A: As @haris points out in the comments, a common mistake made when doing TDD is to treat the build and test phases as independent. In any situation, it is impossible to know that the code you're writing will not be tested. What you can do is create a mock that mimics the HTTP response from the target class. Let's call this the MockedResponse. It will be a class containing the information returned from your endpoints, but with the special requirement that it also contain the HTTP headers you're expecting (or a simple mapping of the expected headers to their actual values).
