I'm not a fan of credit card companies that charge their customers an outrageous fee for not signing up for that banking services. These companies get their information from credit reports. This is an important disclosure because a credit report -- which shows a history of your past credit activity -- is a major part of your identity. Asking you for your credit card number is a good way to build that history, so that a potential lender can judge your creditworthiness. The company says there's no risk to individuals who don't have credit cards. Don't provide credit card information if you don't intend to use it for this purpose -- and even if you do. It's not a good idea to share your full, real name. A lot of shady vendors and scam artists target people on social media for that reason. There's no surefire way to check who's online, but you can investigate under a different identity. If your identity is truly private, you can use a different email address to purchase Microsoft apps and other software. You'll need to open that email and use your password as a form of authentication. Using Microsoft to verify your identity is a good idea as well. Your Microsoft accounts, such as Outlook.com or Hotmail.com, are kept in the cloud and can be accessed from anywhere. Beware of phishing emails. These are emails that impersonate banks or other legitimate businesses and try to get your bank account details or steal your identity. Gmail users can tell a phishing email from a real one by looking for the "verification" tag, which is supposed to be a link, in the email's subject line. You can also check if an email is legitimate by looking at the URL. If you see a sign-in page with a company name -- like -- Google for the company and check if the URL is the official site. A message from Google says there was a problem verifying you. Click

Monday, September 23, 2009 If you are like me, you use a lot of MS Office documents in your day-to-day life. The most popular document I use is the ever-popular Word document, mainly because it's the most convenient. I'm not saying there's anything wrong with Office, but if you've ever tried to write a small blog post or something, it can be a painful experience for a non-technical person. That's why I am very happy to introduce a little app called Offline Docs. It is a simple little app that you can use to store Word documents on your computer, and then read those documents offline as and when you need to. In fact, this is what I use at home when I need to work on files that are specifically designed for me - I don't care about them online, so they don't even appear in my "online files" section. Using the Offline Docs app is an absolute breeze. I've used similar apps in the past (like SugarSync), and they were pretty complicated to use. But with Offline Docs, you can quickly and easily drag and drop folders into your Offline Docs folder, and it stores all documents in a nice little archive. It also allows you to sync your documents with your online account (such as Google Docs), so you can edit those documents while you are online. When you are online, your documents are synced with the cloud and are available to view, edit or print. I've been using it for the last few months, and I love it. The best thing about this is that you can just use the same browser you are currently using to access the internet, and you'll be able to use the Offline Docs folder you've created. I can't stand it when I'm online and I need to have a quick word document for work, but I don't have my laptop with me. You can even sync your documents to a tablet or phone, and access them 6d1f23a050
